Today's art piece of the week is a picture of a Rosy Maple Moth that my friend Pascale drew. This is an audio medium, so I will describe it.

This moth is a friend. The soft pink and yellow tones, bleeding slightly out of the lines, invite you to metaphorically lay your head on it's large, uneven wings. It's two small pink arms curl upwards signalling a hug waiting to happen, and on it's beige face is a smile that warms the heart. The pink antennae look soft, and they sit at uneven angles as if waving back and forth. This moth loves you.

Today's roman king of the week is Servius Tullius. 578-535 BC Born a slave, he was raised to kingly status by rumors of his godly parentage and some clever manipulation on the part of the previous queen. He was a popular king, and improved living conditions for lower class citizens and immigrants. It was rather a shame when he was murdered in the street by his son-in law, and his daughter drove a chariot over his body.
